

03 April 2016

Dear Mr Hopson,

We are writing to you to express our concerns regarding the junior doctors contract. The escalation of strike action is something nobody wants, is not in the best interest of patients and does not help trusts provide the care they would want to.

However, the vast majority of junior doctors, consultants, Medical Royal Colleges and the public support the position of the BMA and that the current planned contract is not safe for patients and not fair for doctors. It is frustrating that you have stated that the escalation of strike action makes negotiations impossible because it was clear before the announcement of escalation that the government were not willing to listen.

Junior doctors have been speaking out in large numbers at their concerns regarding the contract and how this relates to the weekend effect and the still as yet undefined '7 days NHS'. There is no evidence that having more junior doctors at the weekend will improve care and the government have not investigated this. There has been no research into how many extra doctors are needed to staff a 7 days NHS or how much this will cost. The Francis report stated that any major change in care provision needed to be risk and impact assessed and the government have not done this.

That being said a properly funded and staffed 7 day NHS could be great, could improve efficiency and possibly patient care and is something most doctors support the idea of. However, there is already a huge recruitment crisis in the NHS. Hospital trusts are spending increasing amounts on locum staff because there aren't enough doctors already. The contract will stretch staff further, will worsen the recruitment crisis and cost money through the increased need for agency staff. The contract discriminates against women and will put off a large number of women from applying to medicine or continuing with their training. The further stretching of staff in post and the rota gaps this will create during the week will then put patients at risk and this is something no one wants to see.

Staff, not just junior doctors but porters, health care assistants, nurses, radiographers from across the country have been writing to their CEOs in large numbers (8,000 signatures on over 50 letters) asking for trusts to speak out against imposition. While foundation trusts could choose to not impose the contract fines from Health Education England have been suggested and further fines is not what the NHS needs.

However, if hospital trusts across this country could, in a unified voice, ask for the government to drop the imposition of the junior doctor contract and return to negotiations under a moratorium then this could halt the current planned strike action and see a contract developed that would retain staff, would train the brightest and best in this country, fill the rota gaps which keep costing trusts millions and could lead to an NHS where there are enough highly skilled doctors to provide the 7-day NHS the government have promised.

We request that you consider asking for the government to stop the imposition of the junior doctor contract and to appeal for further negotiations to occur to bring an end to this dispute.

We look forward to your reply,
